Telling the Real Story of Human Trafficking

 Polaris

LETTER FROM THE CEO —

The Liam Neeson-shaped elephant in the room

In the anti human trafficking world, “Taken” has become a shorthand for how NOT to make content about human trafficking.

The reference is to Taken, a 2008 action-adventure film starring Liam Neeson as a heroic father racing to save his teenage daughter, who was forcibly kidnapped to be sold into human trafficking. It was successful enough to spawn two sequels.

The film was created as entertainment in the action-adventure genre and no one involved claimed to be telling a “true” or “ripped from the headlines” story. Unfortunately, it had the unintended effect of completely miseducating the public about what human trafficking is, how it happens, and who it happens to. Nearly 15 years later, those of us who work in the anti-trafficking field are still managing the consequences. Indeed, we often start out saying things like: “You know that movie Taken? Well that’s not really how trafficking happens.”

Such is the power of narrative. And with great power – stop me if you’ve heard this – comes great responsibility.

This guide is not meant to make you think twice about creating content about human trafficking. Our goal is to help you do that important and potentially powerful work with the guidance of those resilient, brave, powerful people who have experienced trafficking and fought their way to freedom. This guide was informed by a diverse community of survivors of sex and labor trafficking, including Jessa Dillow Crisp, April Baker and many others who did not choose to be thanked by name. We are grateful to all for their time, their commitment and their unparalleled expertise.

We are also hopeful that with their guidance, content creators can help those in a position to make the kinds of changes we need, while understanding the reality of the crime, and with it, the solutions that do and do not work. Accurate portrayals of human trafficking may also help victims and survivors who don’t currently self-identify to recognize their own experiences and seek help if they choose.

Thank you for all you do. Your work could not matter more.

Who Is Polaris?

Named after the North Star, an historical symbol of freedom, Polaris works to reshape the systems that make sex and labor trafficking possible and profitable in North America. Over two decades, Polaris has assisted some 30,000 victims and survivors through the U.S. National Human Trafficking Hotline and built the largest known U.S. data set on the crime. With the guidance of survivors, and working with public and private-sector partners, we use that data to understand and improve the way trafficking is identified, how victims and survivors are assisted, and how we can prevent this abuse at the scale of the problem – 25 million people worldwide robbed of the basic right to choose how they live and work.

THE BEST BEST PRACTICE —

Working with Survivor Anti Trafficking Professionals

Everything we know about human trafficking – including everything in this guide – comes from the lived experience of people who have come out the other side and shared what they have learned.

Working in real partnership with survivors as you craft your content is the single most important step you can take to ensure your work is as impactful as it is entertaining and informative. It also means taking care not to re-exploit people who have already lived through trauma and dehumanization.

Partnership means:

- ✓ Hiring survivors with lived experience relevant to your content to consult on the project and compensating them as you would any other expert
- ✓ Hiring survivors to work on the project in other capacities, including the co-creation of content
- ✓ Never using a survivor's personal story or experience without express permission of the survivor
- ✓ Never telling someone else's story without compensation
- ✓ Being clear about how a person's story of their own lived experience will be used – and how many times – before the person shares their story

PART 2

THE NARRATIVE ARC —

Understanding Human Trafficking

While every situation is unique, traffickers tend to follow patterns. Understanding “typical” trafficking scenarios can help to spark ideas about stories to tell that are both realistic and powerful.

A QUICK REFRESH

Human trafficking is the use of force, fraud or coercion to get someone to perform labor or sex acts in exchange for money or something else of value such as a place to live or an addictive drug.

Key Points

- ✓ Trafficking has nothing to do with moving something or someone from one country to another. That is smuggling, which is a crime against a border, not a person; people can be trafficked in their own homes.
- ✓ Force, fraud or coercion MUST be present for a situation to be trafficking and that force, fraud or coercion MUST be the factor that compels the person to remain in the situation. If you hire someone and promise to pay a certain amount then renege on that promise, that is fraud. If the person you cheated is free to leave and go file a complaint it is not trafficking, though it may be exploitation. This situation only becomes trafficking when the defrauded person is, for example, threatened with deportation for complaining.
- ✓ The EXCEPTION to the force, fraud or coercion requirement is that children participating in commercial sexual activity is ALWAYS considered trafficking under federal law. There is no such thing, under federal law, as a child prostitute.
- ✓ Not all adult commercial sex is trafficking. There are adults who choose to make a living in the sex trades, but it’s important to remember that choice exists on spectrum. For example, there are many people who choose to make a living in the sex trades because there are no other good options available to them.
- ✓ Human trafficking can happen in any business – not just in sexually oriented businesses like escort services or strip clubs. It can also happen where no business exists in any formal sense – such as within families.
- ✓ While human trafficking CAN happen to anyone, certain individuals and groups of people are far more vulnerable than others.
- ✓ People being trafficked will not always or even often identify as trafficking victims. Because of how trafficking works, most people do not identify their experience as trafficking until AFTER the situation is over.

The human trafficking story arc

Unlike murder, or robbery, human trafficking is not a single event that happens at one specific moment in time. Trafficking occurs through a series of activities that take place over time, throughout the course of a day, for months or even years.

Like any traditional, linear narrative, the story of every sex and labor situation has a beginning, a middle and – we hope – an end. The beginning and middle tend to follow fairly common patterns. How trafficking ends is as unique as the resilient survivors who manage to find their ways to freedom.

“One thing I find hard to take is language or pictures or stories about ‘innocence lost.’ I feel like that means some victims are worthwhile and some are ‘guilty.’”

– A survivor of human trafficking

Who gets trafficked and why

If you've done any research at all on human trafficking, chances are you have run into one of two ubiquitous tag lines or tropes:

"Human trafficking: It can happen to anyone."

AND

"Human trafficking is happening right here, in our own backyards."

These phrases were coined at a time when the concept of human trafficking happening in the United States – as opposed to in faraway countries – was new and surprising.

And technically, it is true that anyone can be a victim of human trafficking. But these phrases are also a little misleading because in reality, certain individuals and communities are far more vulnerable than others.

That's because human trafficking doesn't happen in a vacuum. It is the end result of a range of other persistent injustices and inequities in our society and our economy.

Traffickers recruit victims by offering them something they desperately want or need. Sometimes that's a job. Sometimes it's love, a safe place to sleep or a sense of belonging and community. So it makes sense that there is more trafficking in communities where needs are greater.

Data shows that the vast majority of trafficking victims identified in the United States are people who have historically faced discrimination and its political, social and economic consequences: People of color, indigenous communities, immigrants and people who identify as LGBTQ+ are disproportionately victimized. People living in poverty, or foster care, or who are struggling with addiction, trauma, abuse or unstable housing, are all at a higher risk for trafficking.

So is human trafficking happening right here, in our backyards? Well it really depends on what else is in your backyard!

CLICHE ALERT

The other problem with the ubiquitous phrase "it's happening right there in your backyard" is that it makes it sound like the way to protect yourself and your family is through vigilant policing of strangers. It's not! Read on.

PART 3

REAL STORYLINES —

Typical Trafficking Patterns

Labor trafficking: The basics

KEY POINTS

How does labor trafficking begin?

Labor trafficking most often begins with a simple job offer. It becomes trafficking when pay or working conditions are abusive and the worker cannot quit or complain because the boss is threatening them or exploiting their desperate economic circumstances. Kidnapping or physical force are rarely part of how labor trafficking situations begin.

Who are the traffickers?

Traffickers can be business owners, bosses, or other workers with a managerial role in a formal business. Traffickers can also be victims' families or legal guardians, including parents, spouses and intimate partners.

Who are the victims?

Anyone can be victimized by a labor trafficker, but certain people are far more vulnerable than others. Economic need is a key risk factor and immigrants – including immigrants who are in this country legally – are particularly vulnerable to labor trafficking.

Why don't the victims just leave?

The most common ways traffickers control victims are through threats or economic abuse. Immigrants are vulnerable to labor trafficking because many have come to the United States due to violence or severe poverty in their home countries. That makes threats like “if you complain, I will call ICE” extremely powerful. Additionally, many labor trafficking victims are bound to traffickers by debt and the belief that even the minimal amount they are being paid is better than their other options.

How do we reduce or prevent labor trafficking?

Vigorous enforcement of basic labor protections afforded to workers in the United States would go a long way toward reducing labor trafficking, as would efforts to help workers understand their rights and the protections available to them. Increased employer accountability or “skin in the game,” is also vital to reducing labor trafficking.

Real labor trafficking storylines

Below are the kinds of labor trafficking situations that we hear about most frequently on the U.S. National Human Trafficking Hotline. They are by no means the only ways that labor trafficking can occur, but taken together may help you craft your own stories in ways that are realistic and impactful.

1 Migrants, immigrants and domestic work

- Recruitment and grooming: A diplomat entices someone from her home country with an offer to come to the United States and care for her children. They promise the worker a good wage and the opportunity for her to go to school here. The diplomat repeatedly tells the worker how lucky she is for the opportunity she would never get at home. If she returns home without having completed the job, she will be ashamed because so many people in her community are desperate for better opportunities.
- Coercion and control: When she gets here, the worker is told she will sleep in a closet and is also responsible for keeping the house and yard, and making and serving all meals. Her passport is taken and she is told she can't leave the house without permission. When she complains, the employer threatens her family in her home country and says she will call ICE and have the worker arrested for being here illegally.
- Exit: The worker sneaks a phone call to a community center for people from her country and gets help. The trafficker is never punished.

“Most labor trafficking victims in the U.S. are immigrants, but they are not necessarily undocumented immigrants – that’s a myth.”

– A survivor of human trafficking

2 Domestic work in marriage

- Recruitment and grooming: A man from a conservative, patriarchal society promises a poor girl's family he will marry and take care of her in the United States. She has been raised her whole life knowing she will have an arranged marriage.
- Coercion and control: Once here, the wife is forced to take care of the husband's children from another relationship, keep the house, work in the family business and not leave the house. She has no money and does not speak the language. Her husband tells her complaining will bring shame on her family and ruin her sister's chances of a good marriage.
- Exit: The wife befriends someone in her religious community – the one place she is allowed to socialize – and the friend helps her find a lawyer.

3 Exploitation of disabilities

- Recruitment: A couple befriends a woman with a developmental disability and promises her safety and shelter in return for help around the house.
- Coercion and control: The victim is put to work in a family business for long hours every day and not paid. She is told if she doesn't like it, they will send her to a halfway house that is more like a prison. They cash her disability check monthly.
- Exit: The victim's family, who has lost track of her, finds her and brings her home.

Human trafficking does not have to involve movement from one place to another at all. A person can be trafficked in their very own home. This myth is problematic because conflating trafficking with smuggling leads to solutions in the name of fighting trafficking that are unrelated to how trafficking actually happens – such as building a wall between the United States and Mexico.

KEY POINT

4 Exploitation of addiction

- Recruitment: A person struggling to stay clean from drugs joins a spiritual community that lives under the guidance of a charismatic leader.
- Coercion and control: The formerly addicted person is put to work making and selling crafts in abusive conditions for no pay. Those who complain are expelled from the community, which they have come to depend upon in order to maintain sobriety.
- Exit: The victim collapses from exhaustion and hospital staff recognize she needs help and connect her with services.

5 Fraudulent job offers

- Recruitment and grooming: A mid-level manager in India is offered a dream job that sounds like a promotion in the United States. When the family gets here, the trafficker tricks them out of their savings, takes out a loan under their name, and then tells them they are working in the back of a restaurant washing dishes.
- Coercion and control: The family is not paid and has no money to escape. The trafficker tells them if they complain to the police they will be arrested and separated from their children because they entered the country illegally.
- Exit: One of the children's teachers notices they have no winter coats and goes to visit the family. They confide in her and she helps them seek legal assistance.

6 Recruitment fees and debt bondage

- Recruitment and grooming: A 25-year-old man from an Indigenous community in Mexico learns on social media about a job at a farm in the United States. The job comes with a legal, temporary visa and is well paid. In his hometown, most of the adults take these kinds of jobs overseas for half the year to support their families.
- Coercion and control: He is told by the recruiter that it costs $5,000 for the visa but the advertised wages make it worthwhile, so the worker borrows the money from his new employer. When he gets here, he is told he is working off the debt the business owner incurred bringing him here and will not be paid for the first several months of work. Soon, his boss begins charging him for water, lunch, and transportation to and from the work site. His debt is increasing at a rate that will be extremely difficult to pay back. If he leaves, he will have no way to pay back the money he borrowed. The boss tells him he will be barred from ever returning on a legal visa. Although there is no such thing as an official blacklist, the worker knows that his boss knows many of the recruiters who come to his town, so it would be impossible to get work in the future. He feels he has no choice but to stay and try to pay off the debt.
- Exit: Too concerned about being blacklisted for the future, the worker decides to just get through the abusive situation and try for a better position next year. His parents have to sell their home and move in with relatives to pay their debt.

Sex trafficking: The basics

KEY POINTS

How does it begin?

People in sex trafficking situations almost always know and even trust or love their traffickers. Traffickers target vulnerable people who have needs that the traffickers can fill. Sometimes they offer material support – a place to live, clothing, a chance to “get rich quick.” Other times they offer love, emotional support or a sense of belonging. Kidnapping victims and forcing them into the sex trade through violence is rare.

Who are the traffickers?

Traffickers come from all genders, races, ethnicities and walks of life. In sex trafficking situations, they may be intimate partners or spouses of the victims, family members, friends or benefactors, business acquaintances and bosses.

Who are the victims?

Anyone can be trafficked, but some people are far more vulnerable than others because they have greater needs. These include people living in poverty or in unstable housing situations, as well as people with a history of trauma or addiction. Because of current and historic discrimination and inequity, people of color, immigrants, and people who identify as LGBTQ+ are more likely to be exploited for these vulnerabilities and face trafficking.

Why don't victims just leave?

In many cases, people in sex trafficking situations do not see themselves as victims while they are being trafficked. They have been so expertly manipulated or “groomed” that they believe they are making their own choice to engage in commercial sex. These emotional ties are as powerful as being held in handcuffs or behind bars. People in sex trafficking situations may well also depend on their traffickers for physical needs like money or shelter. They may face threats against them or their families or violence if they complain or try to leave.

How do people get out of sex trafficking situations?

Every story is different. What they have in common is resilience. Survivors come to the understanding that they want to leave the situation, and then fight to get out. Sometimes they get help from service providers, or anti trafficking organizations, but the concept of “rescuing” adult sex trafficking victims is misleading and dangerous. Survivors rescue themselves.

How do we reduce or prevent sex trafficking?

Human trafficking doesn't happen in a vacuum. It is the end result of other inequities in our society and our economic system that make people vulnerable to the enticements of traffickers. So while prosecuting traffickers and seeking justice for survivors is vital, it is not enough by itself to end trafficking. To reduce trafficking at the massive scale of the problem, we need to work together as a society to increase supports and services for vulnerable people and change conditions – like homelessness, family violence, poverty and discrimination – that make people vulnerable to the lure of traffickers.

Real sex trafficking storylines

Below are examples of the kinds of sex trafficking situations that we hear about most frequently on the U.S. National Human Trafficking Hotline. They are by no means the only ways that sex trafficking can occur, but taken together may help you craft your own stories in ways that are realistic and impactful.

1 Romeo pimps or “boyfriending”

- Recruitment and grooming: A man and a woman meet briefly at a party and afterwards, he follows her on social media. He contacts her after she posts about a breakup with her baby’s father. He is everything she ever dreamed of – a great listener, very supportive. He showers her with gifts. She is deeply in love and believes she has found the person she will build her family with. One night he takes her to a party and he tells her to be “nice” to his friends – to earn jewelry. He makes it seem like it’s no big deal at first, so she does it. But then it becomes more frequent.
- Coercion and control: He keeps all the money she earns and tells her he is saving for them to buy a house. Sometimes he hits her to help her understand how much he needs for her to contribute. He says he will stop loving her and she will be alone again if she keeps making trouble.
- Exit: After he blackens her eye, she packs up a “go” bag, calls a friend and escapes when her trafficker is out of the house.

“Understanding what happened to you as trafficking is a really important part of healing, but it took me 10 years to realize: Hey. Wow. I was trafficked, because my situation was so different from what I had seen represented as trafficking.”

– A survivor of human trafficking

2 Familial trafficking

- Recruitment and grooming: Mom is a survivor of rape and abuse who has been prostituting for many years. In her community, there are few options for young people and she is already struggling to support her children. When men start expressing interest in one of the kids, she tells her it's time to contribute to the household and takes her out on the streets.
- Coercion and control: The child loves her mother, and has no other means of support.
- Exit: A teacher notices the child is tired all the time and appears frightened and asks if she needs support. The child confides in her and a social services team comes together to work out a safe place for her to stay.

3 Child trafficking

- Recruitment and grooming: A parent sexually abuses a child himself, and offers the child to others for sexual gratification in exchange for access to other young children.
- Coercion and control: The child has been taught that this kind of activity is 'normal' for parents and children and warned not to tell anyone or they will be hurt. NOTE: Coercion or control is not legally required for this to be considered trafficking because the victim is a minor.
- Exit: An ER doctor notices signs of sexual trauma and alerts child protective services to check on the family after the visit.

Human trafficking virtually never begins with kidnapping or other violent acts. Traffickers almost always know their victims. They are friends, acquaintances who offer jobs, members of their own families or romantic partners.

KEY POINT

4 Online trawling

- Recruitment and grooming: A lonely, insecure teen dreams of a modeling career and frequently posts pictures of herself striking a pose. She is contacted by someone who claims to be a modeling agent and sends her a plane ticket to come to his studio. When she arrives, he takes her out on the town and tells her she has to “be nice” to some people in the business to get contracts and sends her out to prostitute.
- Coercion and control: She is far from home, didn’t tell her parents she was leaving, has no money and is ashamed. He tells her she is making a good impression, and that it will just take a little longer for her hard work to turn into modeling jobs.
- Exit: Eventually the child contacts a friend, who tells her family where she is and she is extracted from the situation.

5 Survival sex

- Recruitment and grooming: A teen who identifies as queer runs away from home in a small Texas town when his stepfather beats him up for his sexual identity. He camps out in a bus station and meets other runaways who tell him about someone they know in Houston who will probably let him stay at his house – for a price.
- Coercion and control: The person who owns the house is very straightforward about the arrangement. The teen can stay there as long as they provide sex to the homeowner and occasionally, other friends. The teen does not have any other options for housing and is also seeking a community, which he hopes to find with the homeowner.
- Exit: The teen meets other young people who have run away. They connect him with a supportive shelter situation and he returns to school.

6 Exploitation of addiction

- Recruitment and grooming: A trafficker hangs outside the municipal courthouse chatting up people as they come out of drug court, where they were busted for use charges. He offers them drugs for free, and slowly feeds their addiction. Soon, in order to access drugs, the trafficker tells them that they have to engage in sex acts for money.
- Coercion and control: Whenever the victim begins to talk about getting clean and getting out of prostitution, stripping, or porn, the trafficker gives them more drugs and builds their dependency. He also warns that he will report their drug use to their probation officer if they leave.
- Exit: The victim contacts the National Human Trafficking Hotline, which helps them find a space in a drug rehab facility.

7 Exploitation of disabilities

- Recruitment and grooming: A young adult with a developmental disability and limited family support is placed in a group living facility.
- Coercion and control: At the home, residents are told that sex with strangers is part of what they are expected to do to earn their meals and rent.
- Exit: After many complaints from family members of other residents who have left the home, it is finally shut down and the residents are sent to other safe facilities.

8 Gangs

- Recruitment and grooming: A young woman grows up in a neighborhood where gangs control most of the commercial activity and the streets. She joins them for protection and a sense of belonging, and because there are few other options available. The gang tells her she has to engage in prostitution and give them the proceeds to help them pay a drug debt they owe to a rival gang.
- Coercion and control: If she leaves the gang, her family, their home and their business will be targeted for violence.
- Exit: When the gang is targeted in a police raid involving drugs, she is swept up by a trauma-informed police officer who understands the situation and connects her with appropriate supports.

9 “CEO pimping”

- Recruitment and grooming: A young woman who grew up in foster care ages out and is left without a place to live or guidance for her future. She meets a man at her job at a gas station who tells her he has connections in the entertainment industry and she should come dance at his strip club where she will meet producers who might need an assistant. After a few weeks, he tells her the reason she isn't getting noticed is that she does not perform sex acts in the club's back room after her shift ends.
- Coercion and control: When she doesn't comply, he threatens to fire and blackball her from any other clubs or music venues in the city. He also makes veiled threats about hurting her and her young child.
- Exit: She stays until she is able to save enough money to quit and begin community college.

PART 4

GLOSSARY AND IMAGERY —

Word and Image Choices and Why They Matter

Glossary of terms

As content creators, you know that language matters. In the anti trafficking movement, this is particularly true. The words you use in reference to the sex trades in particular often carry weight far greater than you may have intended. Here's what you should know:

SEX TRAFFICKING AND THE SEX TRADES

Decriminalization

The anti trafficking movement is largely united around the idea that no one should be arrested for providing sexual services. Arresting people for directly selling sex helps no one and actually makes things worse for people in trafficking situations, saddling them with criminal records that can derail their lives when they manage to leave the trafficker. But the movement is sharply divided over the more nuanced question of what else around the sex trade should be decriminalized:

Full decriminalization

- ✓ No criminal penalties for buyer or seller
- ✓ Legal to buy sex
- ✓ Legal to own a brothel
- ✓ Legal to procure/pimp

Partial decriminalization

- No criminal penalties for the seller only
- ✗ Illegal to buy sex
- ✗ Illegal to own a brothel
- ✗ Illegal to procure/pimp

TERMS

Supporters of full decriminalization believe that selling sexual services should be a choice and that a fully legalized environment will keep people who choose to be in the sex trades safer.

Supporters of partial decriminalization believe that full decriminalization will bring more sex buyers into the marketplace, but will not lead to a corresponding increase in the number of people voluntarily choosing to sell sex. That will result in a market imbalance and traffickers will step in to recruit more victims to fill the gap.

Where you fall in this debate, and it is an extremely complicated and hard-fought one, will then shape which words you choose to describe various aspects of and roles within the sex trades.

TERMS*Sex work

Most people who support full decriminalization refer to the direct sale of sexual services as sex work and those involved as sex workers. The term is consciously crafted to destigmatize the sex trades and empower people who choose to earn their living this way, which defines someone wholly by this activity.

Prostitution

Many in the anti trafficking world believe the term sex work is misleading because the activity involved is neither sex, nor work – it is rape/ assault. Instead, they use prostitution which is legally accurate and well understood. Those living this experience would generally refer to people directly selling sex as prostituted people or people in prostitution as opposed to the more stigmatizing “prostitutes.”

“One thing that drives me crazy is the whole idea of being a voice for the voiceless. I had always had a voice, even when I was being trafficked, so I find that offensive.”

– A survivor of human trafficking

RESCUE LANGUAGE

U.S. law has only recognized human trafficking as a crime since 2000. For years after, much of the work of fighting trafficking – particularly adult sex trafficking – involved helping law enforcement and government to see people as victims who they were used to thinking of as “criminals.”

To do so, many adopted language and tropes that simplified the extremely complex nature of trafficking into a more digestible and compelling narrative – of villainous evildoers, damsels in distress, and swashbuckling heroes.

But the truth is, adults in sex trafficking situations generally do not see themselves as victims while in the situation. And so they do not want or need “rescue,” in any physical sense. And if you try to get someone out of a trafficking situation before they are ready, they will likely return.

One survivor remembers an FBI agent telling her, during her trafficking situation, that she could help her get away from her pimp. The survivor says she was confused at the time. “He isn’t my pimp, I told her. That’s ridiculous. He’s my boyfriend.”

Today, our understanding of adult sex trafficking has evolved. It’s understood that that oversimplification and dramatization – use of certain tropes and language – is not only inaccurate but actually harmful because it creates a false picture of the problem, which leads to ineffective solutions and harm to survivors.

“You can’t rescue a person being trafficked. What you can do is create an opportunity for that person to leave.”

– A survivor of human trafficking

Bottom line:

Just don’t use rescue language in any context related to helping adult survivors of sex or labor trafficking in the United States to get out of their situations. It’s inaccurate and offensive!

- ✗ Rescue
- ✗ Save
- ✗ Set free
- ✗ Voice for the voiceless

Instead consider:

- ✓ Support
- ✓ Assist
- ✓ Help to recover
- ✓ Rebuild and heal

TERMS

“Words like ‘rescue’ turn people off from getting help. It’s too dramatic, like you’re hanging off a side of a cliff. But when you are in the situation, you don’t think you are being trafficked, you just think this is your life. So you don’t recognize yourself.”

– A survivor of human trafficking

Modern slavery

In the United States, the term modern slavery is generally used for emphasis or as a descriptor – as in, “human trafficking is modern slavery.”

In Europe, the term is much less controversial and is widely used in place of human trafficking. In some countries, like the United Kingdom, “modern slavery” is the legal term for this activity.

Some organizations, including Polaris, have chosen to use this as rarely as possible in order to reserve the term slavery for the incomparable institution of chattel slavery in the United States.

The language of blame

Sometimes sentence construction makes all the difference in how people understand trafficking. Specifically, certain sentence constructions imply the person selling sex has chosen to do so, while others suggest that this person may be in a trafficking situation.

“I did not conceptualize what he was doing was exploitation, I just thought it was par for the course. It was what I thought was my life. When you come from a life of abuse, things that might tip other people off aren’t a red flag for you.”

– A survivor of human trafficking

TERMS

Problematic

- “He sold sex”
- “She sold sex”

Preferred

- “He was sold for sex”
- “She was bought for sex”

Imagery

Pictures are indeed worth countless thousands of words, but they are also problematic in the anti trafficking world because they can reinforce stereotypes that paint a false picture of how trafficking looks. These kinds of images can also reignite trauma responses for survivors as they are reminded, graphically, of what it feels like to be treated as less-than-human. Below are some of the worst cliches and stereotypes:

✗ Bar codes overlaid on a real person

✗ Images that suggest survivors are voiceless or cannot speak for themselves

✗ Chains, handcuffs, rope or other hardware that suggest the physical constraint of victims

✗ Shopping bags, price tags, receipts or other images that imply a human being is a commodity of any kind, for sale, or has been purchased

✗ Human meat: People in packaging, such as women trapped in jars, children in vacuum-sealed packaging, or packaging that implies a person is "meat"

- ✗ Body parts: Don't use imagery that focuses solely on a single body part – a hand, a leg, etc. This sort of imagery echoes the dehumanizing aspects of trafficking

- ✗ Prison imagery (unless you are actually portraying someone in prison)

In addition, here are some things to consider when selecting images:

- Race of victims and traffickers: Different types of trafficking are more prevalent among certain communities and it is fine to accurately reflect that fact. If, however, you are reflecting, for example, “sex trafficking” generally, it would be misleading to depict only white women and girls.

It is also extremely important not to perpetuate biases and stereotypes, including, and most egregiously, the stereotype that Black men are more likely to be pimps.

- Age: If you are depicting sex trafficking overall, you will want to be sure that you show people of a range of ages, not just children.
- Gender: If you are depicting trafficking generally, and sex trafficking in particular, be mindful of the fact that men, boys, and people who identify as nonbinary or trans are trafficked as well as women and girls.
- Emotion: While trafficking is indeed tragic and traumatic, it doesn’t always feel that way at the moment it is happening to the people affected. For accuracy, we suggest that pictures showing people who are clearly deeply unhappy as the only imagery is misleading.

PART 5

How Can My Audience and I Help?

There are a number of ways you and your audience can help to reduce and prevent trafficking, help people at risk and support survivors as they rebuild their lives.

LEARN THE STORY, NOT THE SIGNS

Most of the time, adults in sex trafficking situations look and act like anyone else. They may be happy or sad, dressed in any way, and behaving like anyone else. So the popular idea that you can spot “signs” of trafficking out of context if you do not know the people involved is somewhat misleading. But if you understand how sex trafficking really works, you may be able to offer support or help to someone you know or someone who’s situation you understand who appears to be at risk. The key to being able to help is having some degree of context and proximity to the situation.

SHARE INFORMATION ABOUT THE U.S. NATIONAL HUMAN TRAFFICKING HOTLINE

The U.S. National Human Trafficking Hotline connects victims and survivors with services and supports to meet their individual needs and receives reports from third parties about potential situations of trafficking. The Trafficking Hotline is staffed 24-hours a day, 7 days a week, and confidential help is available in more than 200 languages. The Trafficking Hotline is a public resource and you do not need permission to share contact information.

Content creators can help by:

- Letting audiences know how to contact the Trafficking Hotline if someone they know appears to be in a trafficking situation.
- Sharing information about the Trafficking Hotline widely, including through “end cards” or other materials.

Sample end card:

Is your boss threatening you, withholding your paycheck, or restricting your movements?
Do you feel pressured to have sex for money, shelter, or other things you need?

Contact the National Human Trafficking Hotline.

Call 1-888-373-7888 or text 233733

Free confidential help is available 24 hours a day.

Additionally, please share the important message that working to reduce and prevent trafficking does not necessarily mean working only with trafficking survivors or only on programs specific to trafficking. Domestic violence shelters, food pantries, organizations for the homeless, child-serving agencies, all need help and the work they do is very much the work of reducing and preventing human trafficking by mitigating the conditions that make people vulnerable to trafficking in the first place.

“It’s long past time to replace “rescue” with resiliency. I mean do we really think that these programs people run for survivors have such a perfect regimen and system that they are the reason a person who has experienced such trauma is successful? No. Not at all. A person’s success in healing belongs to them and is thanks to them. Period.”

KEY POINTS

Food for thought

It may seem counterintuitive but the word “trafficking” in awareness materials may in fact turn off people who are actually in trafficking situations, since most of the time, they don’t see themselves as trafficking victims.

Instead, think about describing what they might be experiencing. For example:

- Is your boss threatening you? Help is available.

OR

- Do you feel pressured to have sex for money or someplace to live? You have options.
